News paragraph

With stocks rallying as May draws to a close, investors are wondering if the worst of this year's collapse is over. The S&P 500's 13% drop so far this year is its biggest since 1970, fueled by recession fears as the Federal Reserve tightens monetary policy to fight inflation. And rising interest rates dented the allure of tech and growth shares, with the Nasdaq 100's 22% plunge ranking as its largest ever. So where are we now? Last week the S&P was up 2.5%, on less-hawkish remarks from Fed officials and upbeat corporate earnings. But analysts say stocks may have yet to hit a final low. As the new week begins, futures are up in Japan, Australia and Hong Kong

Ukraine President Volodymyr Zelenskiy visited front-line troops in the Kharkiv region in his first trip away from Kyiv since Russia's invasion. Zelenskiy earlier called conditions in the Donbas region to the east as "indescribably difficult" as Russia presses to take more ground approaching the invasion's 100th day. Meanwhile, European Union nations on Sunday failed to come to an agreement on a revised package of sanctions over Moscow's invasion of Ukraine, and Russian President Vladimir Putin promised Serbian President Aleksandar Vucic an uninterrupted natural gas supply.

Sri Lanka needs a new government to tackle its economic crisis, according to the leader of the main opposition party, as its prime minister proposed a system to make the nation's president and cabinet more accountable. The South Asian island nation has been in the worst economic tailspin of its independent history, with shortages of everything from fuel to medicine, power outages and inflation seen rising to 40% prompting angry protests and turning into political risk for the ruling Rajapaksa family. Sri Lanka is currently negotiating for a bailout program with the International Monetary Fund, which is key to
